When i tryed to access the data at the link it gave me the following error: forbidden. Any one out there know why? A: 3.3.4 is a security fix, mainly for the version of MySQL you're using. 3.3.5 is a bug-fix release. Infiltrating the Kupffer cell in atopic dermatitis. Cultured epidermal Langerhans cells (LC) undergo functionally significant modifications upon incubation in supernatants harvested from mononuclear cells (MNC) derived from dermis of atopic dermatitis patients (AD). We report that MNC from AD patients and their HLA-DQ homozygous major histocompatibility complex (MHC)-matched relatives produce the chemotactic factor (CF) and that the essential CF factor in AD MNC is different from the one in LC (Mazur et al., J. Exp. Med., 179: 1573-1580, 1994). The fractions collected from the five representative MNC fractions included HLA-DQ-matched and unmatched family MNC (FMC) from three AD patients. We have isolated the fractions from FMC and characterized the chemotactic factor by enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA) using monoclonal anti-L-FABP. The FACS identified the cells and the chemotactic factor were also detected in LC and monocyte monolayers. We found that significant numbers of LC and monocytes left the monolayers, were captured by FMC, and were destroyed by the LC fraction, whereas the CD1a+ monocytes were not affected by the FMC. SDS-polyacrylamide gel electrophoresis of the chemotactic factors identified by ELISA showed that the chemotactic factors in LC and monocyte monolayers and in the FMCs from the three patients were identical. We also identified the chemotactic factor in monocytes after incubating the monocytes in the AD serum for 6-24 h. However, the chemotactic factor was not found in serum incubated alone. The findings strongly suggest that infiltrating the Kupffer cell through local inflammation is the likely route of LC transfer in chronic dermatitis.This is an archived article and the information in the article may be outdated.
